The pine marten is found widely all across the Europe. It inhabits forests and scrubs. It occurs in six biogeographical regions. Major threat is habitat fragmentation, especially in densely populated areas, combined with poaching.
So far, its conservation status is assessed as 'favourable' in Alpine, Atlantic, Boreal and Continental regions. However, Belgium and Luxemburg have reported it as 'unfavourable-bad' while the Netherlands and Italy as 'unfavourable-inadequate' but improving. It is assessed as 'unknown' due to a major lack of data in Mediterranean region. In the Pannonian region it is assessed as 'unknown but not favourable'. There is not enough information provided by some countries.
It is classified as 'least concern' according to the IUCN.
